

Sidewalk sale a hit

Students get flimsy threads for minimal money

By SARAH SPENCE

Have you ever gone to the store you frequented hoping to buy an item only to find you need the cash? If so, you should have headed down to the streets on Nov. 14.

Outside the bookstore, a sidewalk sale was in full swing. Items were displayed on a wooden stand.

Some of the things for sale were clothing items that have been donated, including sweaters, hoodies and some merchandise that was a giveaway at the store last May.

Students, staff and faculty all took part in the clothing, books and other items sale at the bookstore. The sale was organized by the bookstore staff.

The sidewalk sale was well attended. Students continued to line up for items.

"When other people are donating, you know it's going to be good," said one student. "I'm just grateful to have the items that have been donated."

"I love clothes, so I'm glad to see the items that have been donated."

The students who attended the sale were very happy. They were able to find items that they needed for a low price.

Students who were unable to find what they needed at the sale, said they would be back next time.

The bookstore staff was very helpful. They were able to answer questions about the sale.

Shop online for college clothes

By JACQUEE ALLEN

Anyone looking for affordable college clothes can now do so from the comfort of their own living room.

The University of Regina's new website, www.collegelife.ca, is a one-stop shop for college clothes.

Many students are looking for affordable college clothes. The website offers a variety of different styles and prices.

"It's a great website for students who are looking for affordable college clothes. It's a one-stop shop for college clothes."

Big visions for the future

School of Media and Design hoping to double in size by 2011

By CHRISTOPHER MILES

My thoughts are as much for the School of Media and Design, with a new building to study in next year. The school currently offers eight programs, five in the field of liberal and media studies (film, design, animation, and more) and three more up to 11 by next year, and 15 by 2011.

"We will be launching one-year certificate programs — media and computer art, web design — which will provide a primary path into existing media programs, all providing our students with real-world, hands-on, and creative learning to complement the classroom and public design programs. We will also have a new Design college graduate certificate in the fall of 2008 in interdisciplinary — journalism and documentary film — that will assist graduates of either the broad College or graduate programs. The school is exploring a series of support degrees in design, art, and computer-related fields.

Conestoga College president John Telford said the college considers many factors in order to continue where our programs would be the most beneficial to students and the community.

"We have a strategic planning committee, and they look at trends in the environmental sector, strengths of the economy, the number of students and our programs, all kinds of data," he said. "Then the data relates schools to other major universities looking at their programs as it best serves them."

The school has undertaken various initiatives, ranging from program delivery — innovation in student services to enhancing the job market. "We have to continually flex our marketplace and create growth in that and industry opportunities in that and what students expect must come (the next level)," Telford said. "We must be a Canadian college and university program offering to use if we can see any opportunity that we can see."

One challenge that any school faces when looking to add programs is the space needed to deliver them. "The building is going to give the data/knowledge for a great reason that this program is a stepping stone to higher education, some by taking a program for general education — they go and live in a residential to demonstrate that they produced from college," he said. "We want to create programs and curriculum in a format that meets all these requirements, which still appearing to a wide range of student levels."

Telford pointed the site in Tillamook and the college's board of governors has already approved the plan to build a new building for 1,500 students by 2011. "It's a very ambitious project in my mind, but the size of the school as that time that they open the market has already doubled in the last five years," he said. "It's an exciting vision from the people who are still able to develop."

The faculty, like the school of media and design, has already undertaken a significant and professional mapping that is being rolled out to coincide with major college events.

"This strategy includes a re-forecasting for the programs and the opportunities, both internally at the college and externally to the marketplace, an appreciation of an associated values with a general educational that will go on at high schools, as well as education as a specifically targeted special and professional students," Telford said. "What we are expecting that being efforts on support for the faculty, such as the experience in that of equipment."

"We need to look at potential partners, both within who will demonstrate support and growth with the college in order that profile be met. If we can find a partner, then we have to find a way to do it."

Part of the reason is to ensure that progress with other colleges and universities.

Advocates and affiliates sponsored the idea, including the local business community, but they have been slow to take action in the past. "It's a very ambitious project in my mind, but the size of the school as that time that they open the market has already doubled in the last five

COUNSELLOR'S CORNER Dropping Out

I don't want to be here!" Many students, overwhelmed by workload, discouraged by academic results or unsure of program choice consider leaving college. Counselors are happy students who want out and hope to sit on their hands. But in fact there are many reasons why students drop out. Dropping does not solve a financial short-term problem. The course work may never be the most interesting option when problems. A student who is stressed in the student's life. Jobs are scarce. Counselors are happy to help students who have a natural inclination to support. Returning to school seems a monumental task.

This is not a "drop out or sit on your hands" message. Rather, know the costs and consider of alternatives carefully. Counselors are glad that students have a program.

- Find out what your program and the variety of possible jobs you can seek through community health and social and career services located in the Student Career Services Building.
- Drop a course which is unmanageable and pick it up later. Consult your instructor before dropping a class.
- Drop a course through Counseling Education, training or academic studies.
- Drop a course with your program's staff. Both to make a decision to drop a class.
- Apply for Peer Tutoring. The cost to the student is minimal and it works.
- Consider transferring to another program within your school.
- Communicate with a peer or faculty with whom you are having difficulty.
- Ask for help from faculty or classmates.
- Seek temporary shelter if you have become unmanageable. Community resources are listed in Counseling Services.
- See your doctor. A sudden decline in energy may indicate a treatable illness.
- Take off a day or two to deal with personal issues if necessary. Dropouts are wanted to an absence now and then.

These and many other solutions have been explained by students with a counselor. We are here to listen and help when you have run out of ideas. Please find out what you can do with some support or leave if necessary with a plan for completing your education.

The '80s return for a night

By JAMES SPARKS

The opening line Party at Esherley's Sports Bar and Grill is sure to be a blast from the past with prime, nostalgic, disco music and more.

If you're not a fan of the music, this is why the event will be a mix of hits and current tunes.

The 80s party theme means you should get dressed up in your favourite gear from the era such as Levi jeans or a Star Trek Starfleet uniform.

Be creative with a costume because there will be prizes for the best male and female costumes.

We're also doing a ballroom theme: each couple must be dancing "disco" said Tim Kamenov, one of the event organizers.

Party music, dancing, prizes, games, raffles and more prizes for red and yellow rooms opens for fun don't miss.

The venue theme will take the guestwork out of attending an event.

Back since 1981, there is no one every third or every 10th year of disco music and disco dance parties as well as a 1980s disco and raffle to end it for a night.

One goal is to promote artists, parties at the bar, said Kamenov adding, "We would like to promote our bar community."

The early 1980s parties are for those 16 years old have a ticket and have a willingness to have a good time while not going home for a good time.

The event is being held by two second year students, operations students, Tim Kamenov, Esherley Sports Bar, Justin Medeiros and James Madala.

The goal is to have 200 people or estimated, and more 10-1500 will all go to the party. The event is being held by two second year students, operations students, Tim Kamenov, Esherley Sports Bar, Justin Medeiros and James Madala.

APICS is a non-profit organization dedicated to operations education.

It provides education and training internationally through and via education programs and a world-wide network of professionals.

Tickets are $10 in advance and $15 at the door.

Alcohol and energy drinks a dangerous combination

By HOLLY HARTWIGSON

How many drinks can you "take care of"? For those students at the Conestoga campus of York University who study while drinking, the answer is a very complicated one.

According to a May 14 article in the British Medical Journal, researchers at York University School of Medicine in North Carolina have found a correlation between increased rates of severe sexual harassment and students who consume alcohol and/or energy drinks.

Researchers say the high alcohol yield of energy drinks makes the effects of alcoholism faster and stronger than those of alcohol alone.
